2. Summary of Contributions to Science

- Risk assessment and decision making in child protection

My research covers cardinal professional skills and reasoning, including engaging effectively with service users, identifying future risk, and deciding when and how to intervene. It incorporates four levels of analysis—individual, group, organizational, and policy—and seeks to identify the interconnections between them.

- Children’s participation in child maltreatment research and practice

Considering children as active agents in society entitled to decision-making power over their lives, my research focuses on increasing opportunities for meaningful, ethical, and effective participation of children in research and practice around child maltreatment.

- Client aggression toward employees in social services industries

Paradoxically, social services providers become targets of aggression by the same people they are trying to help. My research examines key aspects of workplace aggression, including antecedents, outcomes, and coping strategies.

K. Future Research Plans

A core principle of my scholarly work is to develop action as much as knowledge. My professional experience engaging with individuals who slipped through the safety net of the state’s welfare system elicited a deep commitment to generate evidence that can facilitate early help and effective social programming. A basic question that recently directs my empirical work is: “How can technology help professionals make better decisions?” As a step forward, I started leading a comprehensive research project, designed for several years and funded by grants aimed to improve health care professionals’ capacity to identify and manage suspected child physical abuse cases through the development of an AI-driven digital clinical decision support system that will integrate and bridge the welfare and health care systems.

Of the many things that my empirical research has emphasized is that the provision of social interventions can be done in better or worse ways, but they cannot be taken off the shelf. Failure by policymakers and practitioners to acknowledge broad contextual factors increases the risk of exposing individuals to ineffective or potentially harmful interventions. Therefore, I constantly strive to apply a cross-country perspective to my scientific inquiry. My position as a leading member in several active European research networks provides me with considerable ongoing opportunities for joint international research (see publications in preparation).
